The truth is that the video creators behind the world's best YouTube channels aren't spending their time or money on shady growth schemes. They're too busy making awesome videos. First, let's look at how "free" YouTube subscriber services work. (While keeping in mind that nothing is really free.

As the saying goes, if you're not paying for the product, you are the product.) You earn your "free" subscribers by subscribing to and liking other channels, as instructed by the service. Most ask you to subscribe to 20 channels and like a certain number of YouTube videos. In return, 10 channels will subscribe to yours.

Essentially, you're hiring yourself out as a one-person clickfarm. It's similar to the time we tried Instagram engagement pods. The service hopes that you get bored of all this endless clicking after a few days and decide to pay for YouTube subscribers instead.

Either way, the service wins: they either get your time or your money. Whether you get them through a free scheme or you pay for them, what do you get? Bot subscribers that don't engage A bad look for your real audience, who are probably quite keen on authenticity The risk of running afoul of YouTube's fake engagement policy (tl;dr: you could get banned) Potential stink-eye from any brands that might eventually want to partner with you At the end of the day, it's just not worth it.

There are a lot of clickbait videos out there that claim to tell you how to get 1,000 YouTube subscribers for free. Or even a million! Of course, if it seems too good to be true, it probably is. {2026}
